Professor Alistair Woodward
Head, School of Population Health

Alistair is an epidemiologist and public health medicine specialist who is Head of the School of Population Health at the University of Auckland. Previously he was Professor of Public Health and Department Head at Otago University's Wellington School of Medicine and Health Sciences.

He completed his medical degree at the University of Adelaide; worked as a General Practitioner in Britain and did his public health medicine training in that country; and worked subsequently in universities in Australia.

His major areas of interest include environmental health, the social determinants of health, and tobacco. Recent projects include the effects of second-hand cigarette smoke; links between ethnicity, poverty and mortality rates; and effects on health of radiation from mobile phones.

He is involved in a wide range of health issues and currently acts as a lead author for the 4th Assessment Report of the Intergovernmental Panel on Climate Change, Chair of the Public Health Committee of the New Zealand Health Research Council, Chair of the National Screening Advisory Committee, and a member of the Board of the Pacific Basin Consortium on Environment and Health Sciences.
